Cognitive Behavioral Therapy in Childhood Anxiety

Nilly Mor, PhD, and Joop Meijers, PhD

School of Education, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Jerusalem, Israel

Abstract: Anxiety disorders are the most common childbood disorders. They tend to be chronic and to cause significant impairment. In this article, we review the scientific basis of cognitive behavioral therapy in treating childbood anxiety disorders. We describe the assessment process and its use throughout the treatment. An outline of the central principles of applying cognitive behavioral interventions in the treatment of children is provided and the main treatment components are reviewed. These components include psycho-education, coping skills and exposure. Finally, we discuss the role that parents play in the implementation of cognitive behavioral therapy with anxious children.

The goal of this review is to present an update on the status of cognitive behavioral treatment (CBT) of childhood anxiety disorders. We first present a brief overview of childhood anxiety disorders and their assessment. We then discuss the scientific basis of CBT for childhood anxiety. Finally, we provide an outline of the general principles as well as describe specific strategies of CBT for childhood anxiety.

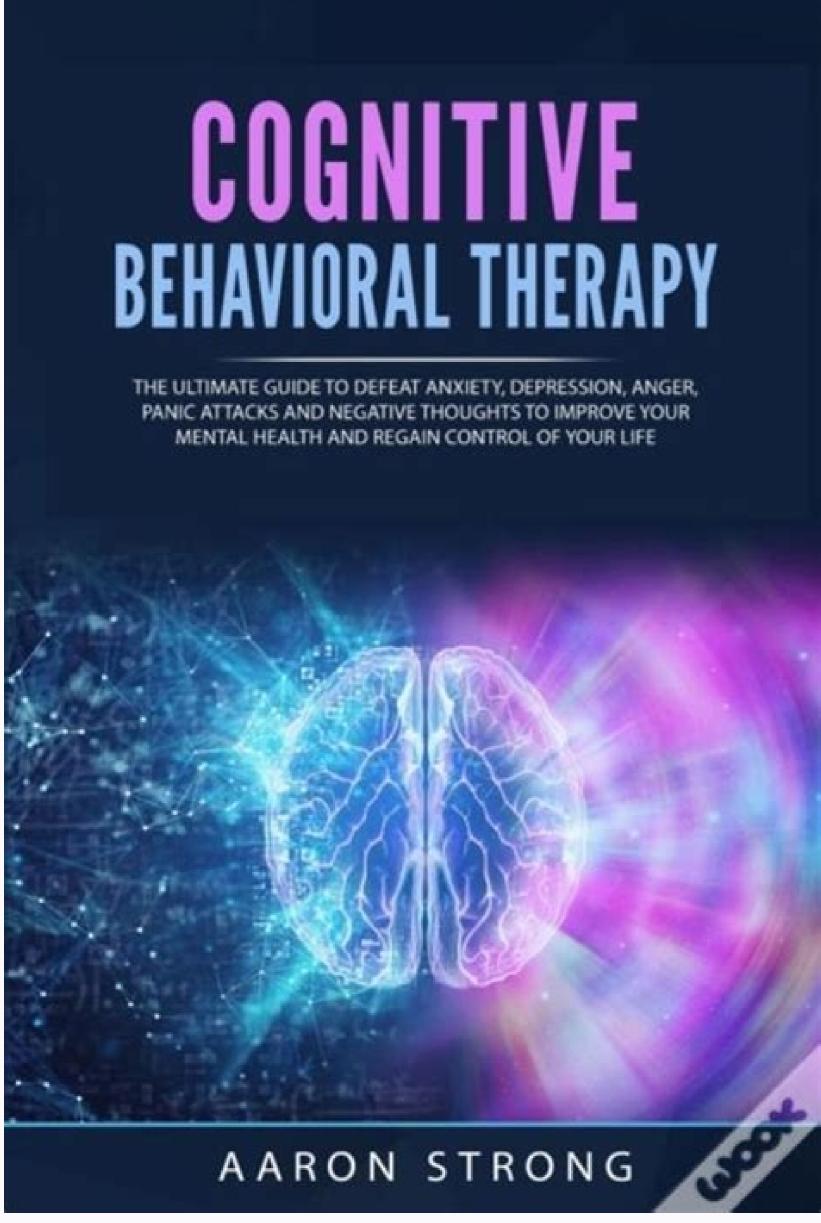

Anxiety disorders are among the most common childhood disorders. Although prevalence estimates of these disorders among children and adolescents vary widely, some studies report prevalence rates of over 20% (1). Retrospective epidemiologic studies of adults with anxiety disorders suggest that anxiety disorders onset during childhood and adolescence (e.g., 2). Left untreated these disorders tend to be chronic and to cause significant impairment of social, educational and emotional development (3).

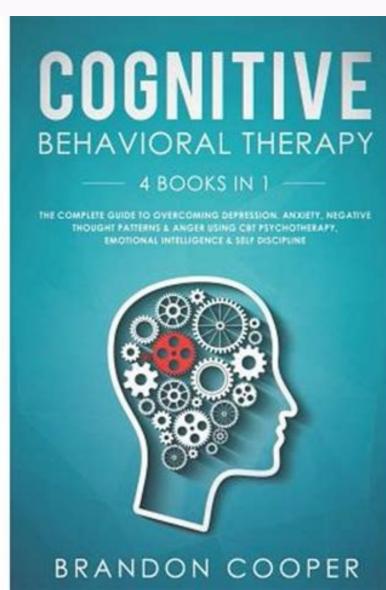

The identification and treatment of anxiety disorders in children can be more complex than in adults. Anxiety and fear are part of normal development in children as they transition from dependency to autonomy (4, 5). Therefore, pathological anxiety is typically defined as age inappropriate anxiety that impairs functioning and causes significant distress. To illustrate, while it is common for young children to show fear reactions in the dark, when separating from a caretaker or when first attending school, similar fear reactions in a teenager who refuses to sleep away from his parents is considered pathological. Another factor that makes it difficult to distinguish between normal and abnormal anxiety in children is that childhood anxiety disorders tend to co-occur (e.g., 1). To overcome these difficulties, clinicians working with children who present with anxiety should conduct a thorough assessment before the initiation of treatment as well as during and following the intervention.

Assessment of Childhood Anxiety

Evidence-based assessment is a term used to describe information gathering that leads to therapyrelated decisions. Assessment is used in different phases of the therapeutic process. Initial data collection leads to case conceptualization, which in turn assists in treatment planning, monitoring of treatment progress, and treatment evaluation. Evidence-based assessment serves several functions: (1) Screening: identifying individuals who have, or are at risk for having, a particular problem, (2) Diagnosis: determining the nature and/or cause of the problem(s), (3) Case conceptualization: developing a comprehensive and clinically

If you think CBT can be an adjustment for you, there are several ways to find a therapist. CBT requires a willingness to be open to change, along with a commitment of time to do the job with your trusted therapist. Treatment may involve them facing situations that you would otherwise avoid. CBT's goal is to help you develop the skills to help you deal with difficulties on your own, at the time they arise, ideally providing you with tools that last a lifetime. But exploring the painful feelings and experiences can be stressful. Alternatively, you may face difficult sources of trauma, such as the death of a loved one.
